NATIVE EDUCATION IN

HONGKONG. THE report of the Inspector of Schools upon the progress made in education during the year 1867, is something more than a mere compilation of dry statistics. It is valuable not merely for the summary it gives of past efforts and present results, but for the suggestiveness of its remarks. We shall endeavor, firstly to epitomize the more interesting paragraphs, and secondly to discuss more fully one or two points which are rather touched upon than thoroughly treated by Mr Stewart.

The report commences by a review of the village schools, which though afford. ing certain advantages still leave native education in a very unsatisfactory state. One great obstacle to progress is the want of an intelligent application of what is learned to the commonest purposes of life. and might be familiarly illustrated by the idea of a person learning by heart the receipt for a pudding while unable to understand the meaning of the phrases stances that upon pointing to the charactense to sound is scarcely credible by those unacquainted with the native sysmany animals refer the sounds they hear to some meaning. Mr Stewart thinks it almost impossible to explain the reasons of this curious phenomenon. as it might well be termed. We shall endeavor in a subsequent paragraph to offer such explanation as a certain acquaintance with Chinese education enable us to give. The comparative success of the Central School, at which an English education is given, does not, in Mr Stewart's opinion. argue against the general contempt with which the Chinese view our scholastic missionary, what man studies Chinese except for the purpose of converting it into dollars? as we purpose republishing his report in I full in our Saturday's edition.

Upon one matter however we must, on the present occasion, quote his own words as it is to his remarks that we would add some of our own. Speaking of the unsatis factory state of purely native instruction, he savs :---

6. The question is often asked-Why is this state of things allowed to continue, and why are not suitable books translated and suitable masters provided to teach To those who are unacquainted with Chinese literature and education, it is impossible to explain why a reform cannot at once be made in Hongkong. To say nothing of the difficulty-in itself not an inconsiderable one-of getting the more appropriate lessons of English schools translated into Chinese, and of training masters-for that would be indispensable, to teach the schools-one who knows anything of the people would pause before displacing Confucius by such works as these. Those who have seen the undisguised contempt with which an educated Chinese looks upon an English school book when he is made acquainted with the nature of its contents will understand what I mean. Ignorant as the villagers are of even their own literature, and unable as they are to give any opinion on education, they have one potent argument in store which would defy contradiction—they would not send one of their children to school.

Now a great deal has been said and sued at native schools of making children steamer. It appears that towards the end the jury would see for themselves, seemed unfortunately subject, there is no reason ly or wrongly, denominated "trash." without a conception of its meaning. The process is at first sight pronounced worse than useless for any conceivable purpose, than twenty-one days between the arrival and there seems to be ample justification for such a verdict. What for instance. says the European, can be the possible use of acquirements such as those of a boy described by Mr Stowart who 'brought up, on the examination day an armful of books consisting of the no other mail is due here till the 6th of nesses for the prosecution. He would details of our household affairs in the hands the 'Four-Books,' the 'Odes for Youth,' used, unacquainted with the ingredients and one or two others, -some ten goodly mentioned and having no possible con- volumes in all. He in lip and tongue could move, for a quarter of an hour, when he thought it time to ter for "eye" and asking its tise, he has stop him." But let us pause for a mofailed to elicit any answer. But with all ment and ask whether it is likely that this there is a wonderful cultivation of Chinese adults who admit the commercial memory, of which the report gives an use of acquiring English, to whom the example. This wonderful prostitution of labor of their children is of absolute value, and who, despite their ignorance. have a profound respect for their own literature-such as it is are likely, at the first blush, to allow their children to acquire all this "rubbish" unless something was to be gained by it? We most certainly believe not, and the most obvious enquiry is in what way can such a parrot-like education be turned to practical use. An answer, but not a sufficient answer, is afforded by the intense veneration with which the Chinese of even the lowest class regard what they term literary acquirements, and to some extent habit of veneration may be supposed to the statement previously made to the Jury influence even the Chinese peasants of Hougkong-just as a desire to be in fashion leads them to victimize one of their dollars, and of this the Chinese are fully female children by compressing her feet. thinking on our own part. They are on their way to Sau Francisco, via Shanghai. The instrument they play are the Cornet a piston, the flagcolet, and the piano, and upon them they execute some exquisite music, solos an duets.
